Ujima Program - Room CC224, (626) 585-7255

The Pasadena City College (PCC) Ujima Program (<https://pasadena.edu/academics/support/black-student-success/ujima/>) is a student-centered, learning community dedicated to the success of African-American students in higher education. The Swahili word Ujima (pronounced oo-JEE-ma) meaning "collective work and responsibility", provides historically under-represented students with an environment that nurtures and supports student development and community involvement. Furthermore, the Ujima Program fosters academic success through culturally relevant curriculum, culturally prescriptive interventions and social justice pedagogy.

This Program seeks to address and shrink the academic achievement gap for African American college students. The Ujima Program uniquely fuses coursework reflective of the African-American experience with the academic rigor required for educational achievement. Students are equipped with success skills, mentoring modules and community building scenarios which helps them to identify with the greater college culture from their first year to their last year at PCC. The Ujima Program Academic Coaching staff is well prepared to work with students from diverse communities. These interactions serve as a valuable resource in the development of student success. Through personal and social engagement strategies, Ujima students (also known as Ujima Queens and Kings) are exposed to campus wide events and activities that enrich leadership skills, builds collaboration among groups and aids in increased retention and persistence rates of our students. Within this learning community students experience the benefits of cohort learning models, dedicated Ujima courses, passionate Ujima teaching faculty and a core group of Academic Counselors and support staff (the Ujima Squad) that constantly work together as advocates for student success. Ujima students are prepped to accomplish their educational and career goals in the academic and global communities. Practicing the philosophy of achievement through collective work and responsibility.
